Employers responding to National Association of Colleges and Employers surveys consistently express the need for graduates with strengths in communication, leadership, and critical thinking. The Relational Communication track within the Communication Studies major provides graduates with tools critical to communicating effectively in an ever-changing global workplace. Students can expect to develop a practical skillset including oral and public presentation skills, advanced research and writing skills, conflict mediation techniques, and strategies for effective interpersonal and relational communication. In addition, students will learn to facilitate group work, develop critical thinking skills, and develop an understanding of communication’s impact on social change and influence.

Course content is key for majors pursuing careers in marketing, management, sales, human resources, advertising and public relations, as well as fundraising, community outreach, nonprofit administration, and health care management. Students pursuing majors in psychology, counseling, social work, and ministry work will benefit from developing an adaptable interpersonal skillset, and those in majors focused on educational settings (including parks/recreation and history/anthropology) will benefit from learning techniques in effective audience analysis, presentation skills, and an enhanced understanding of diverse populations.

Classes like Interpersonal Communication, Relational Communication, Small Group Communication, and The Dark Side of Interpersonal Communication offer opportunities to develop the research, intercultural competency, relational communication ability, and academic writing and oral communication skills necessary for professional positions and post-graduate education. Experiential learning projects and internships develop problem-solving and leadership skills through practical experiences.

In addition to providing students the tools to participate meaningfully in social and work life, the Relational Communication track only requires 34 classroom hours. The Relational Communication track is the perfect double major for those students who want to increase their competitiveness in the job market or in graduate school applications.
